PREFACE.

BOOK A. is a paper book, of which the leaves measure about 17 inches by 6 inches.

It contains 112 leaves, of which only forty-eight have been used.

The paper mark is a hand, with a six-pointed star projecting from the second finger.

The binding is of rough brown calf, probably of the last century or the century before, with a label on the back stamped :

I
16 HEN. 7
TO 16 HEN. 8
1500
1524

The margins are slightly worn, especially at the beginning, but this is of little consequence, as the scribe has usually left an ample margin round his entries, and the book and the writing are in very good preservation. Not a word is lost through mutilation or dirt.

The official who first began to use the book continued to write the entries until the summer of 1520 (fol. 37 of the MS., p. 61 of the printed book), when a fresh handwriting appears. Three years later the writing again changes.

It is clear that the first few pages are not contemporary, but were written up subsequently from other records or memoranda. As an instance of this, the record of the admission of a member at the Parliament of 26 May 1508 is immediately followed, with no break, by the memorandum of payments by him to the Treasurer in 1509. Another case occurs on fol. 14 (p. 27), where the difference in time is about five years.

The majority of the entries in Book A. are in Latin; but occasionally, especially if something has to be noted which is not quite in the ordinary routine of business, the clerk uses his native language. The Latin entries have been translated verbatim, even to the extent of retaining the confusion of tenses and such other instances of faulty grammar as can be reproduced in another language. Care has been taken in the translation to use English words which will suggest the exact Latin word used.

For instance, the two words comitiva and societas are used apparently indiscriminately, as meaning the corporation or whole body of the Middle Temple. In the English entries the words "company" and "fellowship" are used in this sense, and therefore these words have been employed in the translation, the former word to represent comitiva, and the latter societas. This is noted the first time the words occur, on pp. 1 and 3. The English word "society" does not occur till the middle of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and then not often. The Latin word consortium occurs once, in 1586, but no English word is used which at all corresponds to it.

An attempt has also been made to use the English entries for the selection of words and phrases for the translation of entries of a similar import in Latin, as, for instance, libitum is translated "liking"; pro eo, "in its stead"; museum, "study"; and there are many other similar words.

It is for this reason that dolium is translated "hogs-head," though its usual meaning is "tun."

In the case of names, Christian names are translated into English, while surnames are given in the exact spelling of the book; and the names of places as well, unless they are in Latin, when they are translated. The spelling of names is most careless. Sometimes the name of a person admitted differs in spelling from that of his father, which occurs in the next line, as, for instance, Elmes and Ellines; Feteplace and Phetiplace; Nyccolles, Nicholes; St. Aubyn, Seynt Taubyn. Manne is sometimes written Man, and sometimes with a contraction mark appended, so that it would naturally be read Manner. Both represent the name of Man. The Mr. Boyes and Mr. Bowyer occurring on p. 223 must be the same person. Similar variations occur in the names of places, as "Litleforde" and "Lilliforde."

Usually this is merely due to the fact that there was no fixed standard of spelling when the book was made, but sometimes the variation is clearly an error in copying, showing that the entries were not made at once, but that the book was compiled by one of the officials from memoranda, which he sometimes misread.

Book D. is a paper book, about the same size as Book A. (16 inches by $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches), but much thicker, containing 413 leaves, nearly all of which are used. The first few leaves have been somewhat injured, and the top and bottom margins have been slightly cut, probably when the present binding, which is similar to that of Book A., was put on. (a) There is, however, very little of consequence lost by mutilation. The label on the back is:

1551
TO 1610.

(a) See ff. 95, 97, 135, 136, 181, 204.

This volume does not contain the whole of Book D., as it was thought that the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth afforded a good place for a break; but lists of chambers and kitchen utensils made in her reign and that of her predecessor, at the end of the book, are printed at the end of this volume, instead of being reserved for the next, where they would have seemed out of place.

The paper used in these two books is of different kinds. That in Book A. carries the common mark of a gloved hand, with a six-pointed star projecting from the longest finger. This mark is common in early printed books, those of Caxton and others. The same mark occurs also in Book D., but drawn with rather more care, and in some instances there are letters which look like P. R., on the wrist of the glove. An eagle displayed is found in the same book, towards the close of the sixteenth century. Letter paper from Ghent and The Hague of the same period often bears a similar device, but not quite identical with this. However, the paper in these books is of an unusual size, longer and narrower than that used for correspondence, and it was the habit of manufacturers to use various marks for paper of different sizes and qualities. In fact, papers of certain sizes became known by the names of their marks after they had been disused, such as foolscap paper, and pot paper. The latter now bears the arms of England, but that used in Book D. still bears the original device, usually with a four-pointed star above it. A crowned shield with the letter B thereon, and below it a wreath inscribed NLEBE, has doubtless the same origin as a similar shield with the name below in full, NICOLAS LEBE, which may be seen on letter paper used in the reign of Elizabeth. The shield bearing a B. is usual on paper from Antwerp.

There is one very fine coat of arms which I have not been able to identify—apparently, first quarter, barry; second quarter, a lion rampant; third and fourth quarters indistinct, but what looks like a tower in base; the whole surrounded by the collar of the Order of the Fleece of Gold. I have found nothing exactly to correspond with it in Maurice's "Blason des Armoiries des Chevaliers de l'Ordre de la Toison d'Or," and should rather expect it to be the coat of a town than of an individual. The two first quarters appear on the shield of Albert, Archduke of Austria, in 1610, but the remainder of the Archduke's coat is more elaborate.

Book D. has been treated differently to Book A. Instead of being translated in full, merely an abstract of the Minutes is given. The account of each Parliament is commenced with the election of Readers and other officers, and orders on various subjects, and then follow the admissions, collected together so as to save needless repetition. In the original the whole formula of admission is usually repeated in each case, and it is rather a long one; e.g. "Thomas Palmer nuper de Novo Hospicio, filius secundus Willelmi Palmer de Lemyngton in comitatu Glocestr', generosi, admissus est in Medii Templi Societatem, generaliter, vicesimo tercio die Octobris anno regni domine Regine nunc Elizabethe decimo et anno Domini 1568, ex assensu Magistrorum de Banco. Et dat de fine pro sua admissione predicta xl.s."

This may be taken as a typical instance, but at an earlier period the formula was longer, as the names of the persons who became pledges for the newly admitted fellow were added; e.g. "Jacobus Wasshyngton, filius secundus Ricardi Wasshyngton de Kyrkby in Kendall in comitatu Westmerland, armigeri, ad instanciam Ricardi Weston, armigeri, modo lectoris, admissus est specialiter, exoneratur et perdonatur de omnibus officiis et vacationibus quisbuscumque. Et dat pro premissis habendis ad usum hospicii xl.s. Ac etiam admissus est in cameram cum Magistro Bretton. Et dat pro ingressu inde xl.s. Plegii pro gestu, fama et debitis solvendis, G. Nycolls, James Gardener."

In some cases, as above, the signatures of the pledges are appended to the entry, especially during the reign of Queen Mary; but this fashion did not continue long, and during the reign of her sister it became the habit merely to mention the fact of the obligation, as in the following instance: "Edmundus Temple, filius et heres Richardi Temple de Temple Hall in parochia de Sibson in comitatu Leycestr', generosi defuncti, admissus est in Societatem Medii Templi predicti generaliter. Et dat de fine pro admissione sua predicta liij.s. iiij.d. Et obligatur una cum Magistro Christofero George et Magistro Thoma Love de Temple Hall predicto, generoso."

Some of the Treasurers, especially Matthew Smith and Edmund Plowden, signed each admission, but the custom ceased about 1572.

The whole of the facts are given in the abstract, but repetition has been avoided by putting the admissions together at the end of each Parliament.

The handwriting, which at the beginning is very difficult to read and careless, gives place about 1590 to a good clerk's hand, which is continued throughout. In fact the hand is better than the spelling. Besides errors in spelling names, merely due to carelessness, of which I have given a few specimens, errors in words and grammar are by no means rare; such as absentia a lectori, instead of lectura; quantas for quantos, as if members of the Inn might be of either sex; pincerni for pincerne; a banco for abaco; pater morte for patre mortuo; and many others. Similar mistakes occur in the English entries, as where libitum, which is usually translated liking, is sometimes translated liberty, which scarcely gives the correct meaning.

The dates in the text (if not in brackets) are given as they are in the original books, that is, if the year of our Lord is mentioned, it is in accordance with the old style, the year beginning on March 25; but the dates in the top margin follow the modern usage.

An imperfect index of subjects, at the end of Book D., made in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, has been printed in the present volume; but the complete index of persons and places will be reserved until the whole of the Minutes of Parliament are printed.

It has not been thought necessary here to refer to any of the subjects mentioned in the Minutes, as "The Calendar of Middle Temple Records," recently brought out by Mr. C. H. Hopwood, K.C., will direct the attention of the reader to matters of interest.

AN INQUIRY INTO THE ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY OF THE INN.

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE:

ITS ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY.

ALTHOUGH the authentic history of the Inns of Court begins only with the dates of their respective existing Registers, their origin, like that of the British constitution, in the moulding of which they have had no inconsiderable share, may be said to be lost in the mists of antiquity, or, if this rhetorical expression be thought too strong, it may safely be affirmed that, with our present knowledge, it is impossible to fix any definite date for the establishment or formation of any one of them. Sir Edward Coke, whose authority of course is of the highest, places their rise in the period immediately following the making of Magna Charta (1215) and Charta de Foresta (1217), when "divers learned men in the laws . . . kept schooles of law in the city of London, and taught such as resorted to them, the laws of the realme, taking their foundation of" these enactments; and he identifies these schools with those suppressed, or prohibited by writ, in the nineteenth year of Henry III. (1234) (a).

Sir William Blackstone, however, whilst agreeing with Coke that this writ was directed against the teach-

(a) The words of this writ, which is addressed to the Mayor and Sheriffs of London, as given by Coke and Selden, are:—"Quod per totam civitatem London clamari faciant et firmiter prohiberi, ne aliquis scholas tenens (Selden, regens) de legibus in eadem civitate de cætero ibidem leges doceat, et si aliquis ibidem fuerit hujusmodi scholas tenens (regens), ipsum sine dilatione cessare faciant." ing of the Municipal Law, is of opinion that the intention of Henry in issuing it was not to prohibit the teaching of that law altogether, but simply, by forbidding it within the city, "to collect all the common lawyers into the one public university, which was newly instituted in the suburbs" (a). Other authorities, however, of equal eminence, affirm that Henry's writ was not directed against the Common Law at all. Of these Selden and, following him, Dr. Stubbs (b) maintain that the laws (leges) here forbidden were the "Canon Laws, mixed, perhaps, with the Imperials, &c., as being both, in regard of their own authority, against the supreme majesty and independency of the Crown of England" (c).

Professors Pollock and Maitland, again, in our day, are of opinion that only the Civil Law is intended (d), the object of Henry being to confine the clergy to matters strictly within their own sphere—namely, Theology and Canon Law, in accordance with the spirit of the Bull of Honorius III., published only fifteen years before (1219), prohibiting the teaching of Civil Law in the University of Paris.

In the midst of this conflict of opinion on the part of eminent legists, one point at least seems clear—namely, that whatever the intention of Henry's proclamation, the schools referred to in it were law schools of some kind. Possibly they may have been those attached to the principal churches of London (e) as these may

(e) Of these William Fitzstephen, who died 1190, and was at once a churchman and lawyer, in the Introduction to his Life of Thomas à Becket, says there were three having schools attached, which Stowe (Survey of London, p. 63, ed. 1633) identifies as St. Paul's, St. Peter's (Westminster), and St. Saviour's, Southwark, though others (see De Montmorency's English Education) say St. Paul's, St. Mary-le-Bow, and St. Martin's-le-Grand; but Fitzstephen, though he gives a detailed account of their course of study, makes no mention of law as part of it. The subject, have included law as part of their curriculum (a), but more probably they were separate and, perhaps, private institutions (b). But, in either case, it would be unsafe to identify these seminaries with the Inns of Court and Chancery, as Coke and Blackstone apparently do, further than to regard them as in some measure the forerunners and prototypes of those institutions, whose establishment in anything like their present form must be looked for at a later date. For those societies, however they arose, were associations of laymen, and it is certain that for some time after Henry's proclamation the professors of the law as well as its administrators continued to be largely ecclesiastics. The effect, however, of Henry's proclamation, as well as the disapprobation of the papal see (c), was no doubt gradually to diminish the number, and before the end of Henry's reign (1272) the lay element amongst the king's judges began to outweigh the ecclesiastical, and the study of English law became, as a learned modern writer observes, "a thing apart from all other studies" (d). It is at this period then—the end of the thirteenth century—that we may look for the first traces of the existence of the societies now known as the Inns of however, may have been included between the time of his writing (probably about 1185) and the date of Henry's proclamation (1234). Mr. Pitt-Lewis, in his History of the Temple, p. 29, thinks the schools above referred to were St. Paul's, St. Sepulchre's, and St. Andrew's, Holborn, but this enumeration is open to the same objection as Stowe's, which places two of the number outside the "city."

(a) That law did form part of the curriculum of cathedral and collegiate schools is probable, from the fact that the legal and educational officer of the chapter was primarily the Chancellor, who was a lawyer, and whose original style and title was that of schoolmaster (Leach, Memorials of Beverley Minster, Introduction, Surtees Society, vol. i. p. lvii).

(b) The word aliquis in the text of the proclamation seems to imply this.

(c) In 1254 Innocent IV. is said to have forbidden the reading of the Imperial laws in England and other countries, and though the bull to this effect is by some deemed a forgery, it is in accordance with the decree of Honorius III. thirty-five years before, and no doubt expressive of papal policy.

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.

Court, and accordingly we do not find them wanting. Twenty years after the death of Henry III., that is, in 1292, we find his successor, the "English Justinian," in view probably of the diminution in the supply of clerical practitioners, issuing a mandate to the Chief Justice, John de Metingham, and his fellow-judges, "to procure and appoint a certain number of attorneys and apprentices of the law from every county (a), of such as seemed to them the best, worthiest, and most apt to learn, so that the king's court and the people of the kingdom should be better served, and that there should be more facilities (majore commodum), and that those so chosen should follow his court and be present therein to conduct affairs, and no others" (b).

The number of these Attorneys and Apprentices suggested by the king and his council as sufficient was seven score, but the judges might choose more if they saw fit. From this it clearly appears that at the time of this Order in Council there were in existence, apparently in all parts of the country, classes of students or followers of the law known as Attorneys and Apprentices respectively, from which the above select number were to be taken; but there is as yet no sign of their forming separate societies, or of their settling in separate Inns. The concentration, however, of this select number in London would naturally lead to such a result. The tendency of the time was for the followers of a common trade or calling to form themselves into guilds or fraternities for the study and advancement of their several crafts, the protection of their common interests, and the preservation especially of the monopoly they claimed for their particular trades or callings. Infected with the same spirit, it was natural that the lay professors of the law should be desirous of continuing to themselves the privilege enjoyed by their ecclesiastical predecessors, to whom undoubtedly the valuable prerogative of "pleading" in the King's Courts was practically (though not theoretically) confined, and who owed that privilege doubtless to the fact of their superior training and education in conventual or collegiate seminaries (a). The establishment, therefore, of lay schools on the model in point of discipline of these seminaries where the Common Law could be methodically studied, and its practice observed, naturally followed on the act of Edward I., and that these societies should seek for themselves homes in dwellings convenient to the King's Courts was an equally natural development. In process of time the number of Inns thus established seems to have resolved themselves into two classes, the greater and lesser, the former being designated by Fortescue in his time "Inns of Court," and the latter "Inns of Chancery"; but in the beginning there was probably no such distinction (b). When the division came about it is impossible to say, but it was probably only as the natural and gradual result of the prosperity of some of the societies over the rest—the same prosperity which enabled them to acquire, as the opportunity presented itself, the more commodious and commanding homes in which they established them-

(a) By common right every man was entitled to plead his own cause in the King's Courts, and indeed expected to do so. By degrees, however, professional representatives known as "Contours," or "Counters," were permitted. That these should be chiefly ecclesiastics from the lack of education amongst the laity was only natural; but there was nothing to prevent a layman from so acting, and the expression of William of Malmesbury, "Nullus clericus nisi causidicus," often misread as if it were "Nullus causidicus nisi clericus," has reference not to a law, but to an abuse of the times. Nevertheless, in early days, there were few "causidici" who were not also "clerici." See Pollock and Maitland; also Pulling, Order of the Coif.

(b) Evidence of this is seen in the fact that as late as the reign of Henry IV. there were what we should call "calls to the Bar" from the "lesser Inns." See Pearce's Inns of Court, 261. Nor was the distinction between attorneys and apprentices of the law (or barristers) what it was later and is now. Edward I.'s proclamation makes no distinction. They probably resided in the same "Inns" and practised in common in the "High Court."

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.

selves. Fortescue does not give the names of these four greater Inns, but there can be no reasonable doubt that they are the four Inns of Court at this moment existing—namely, Gray's Inn, Lincoln's Inn, and the two Temples (a). That the societies who first occupied these Inns were not new societies, but associations of lawyers who had previously housed elsewhere, there can be no manner of doubt; and though it is not possible either to fix their previous habitats, or, as has been before said, to determine the exact dates of their migration, there is evidence to show that the two first of these societies had removed to their present sites very early in the fourteenth century. If an entry in Vincent's Visitation of Northamptonshire is to be trusted, there must have been "Benchers" in Gray's Inn in 1311 (b), and the sister society of Lincoln's Inn are said to have obtained their famous mansion from Henry de Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, its builder, soon after that nobleman's death in 1310 (c). That the occupation of the Temple by lawyers began not long after is reasonably certain, though they did not come into complete possession and control of it till towards, or perhaps after, the middle of the century (d). The suppression of the great order of Knights Templars, and the expulsion of the English members from their home on the banks of the Thames (1312), opened out a site more suitable even than the great houses in Portpoole and Holborn for the purposes of Inns of Court, and which doubtless became an object of desire on the part of the (a) This was the opinion of Dugdale (Orig. Jurid. p. 142), and it has been that of nearly all writers. Mr. Sergeant Pulling, however, in his treatise, throws doubt on the authenticity of Fortescue's chapter on the Inns of Court, and goes so far as to say that in his time (1470) there were but three superior Inns—the Middle Temple not being then in existence! (Order of the Coif, p. 154). The learned Sergeant seemed unaware of references to the Inner and Middle Temple Inns thirty years before [see post, p. (9)].

lawyers not so well housed. Accordingly, after the grant by the king of the New Temple, or a part of it, to the Earl of Lancaster, we learn that some of them "made a composition with that nobleman for a lodging in the Temple, and so came thither, and have continued ever since" (a). As the Earl of Lancaster held the Temple for about seven years from 1315, this would fix the first settlement of the lawyers there between that date and the year 1322, if the authority of the MS. above cited is to be relied on. But the date usually assigned to the settlement of the lawyers is somewhat later. "The lands of the Templars being bestowed upon the Knights Hospitalers" in pursuance of a decree of 1324, as Dugdale informs us (b), "King Edward III. granted this mansion [of the Temple] unto the Knights of that Order, who soon after (as the tradition is) demised the same for the rent of £10 per annum unto divers professors of the Common Law." Now, although, as Dugdale says, there is nothing but tradition to support this statement, it may not unreasonably be accepted, because it in no way conflicts with known facts; and if, as he goes on to say, these "professors of the Common Law came from Thavye's Inn in Holburne," the migration must have taken place before 1348, when that Inn had been vacated by certain "apprentices of the law" who used to reside in it (c). But there were already in the Temple besides these "professors of the Common Law from Thavye's Inn" the lawyers referred to above who "made composition" with the Earl of Lancaster. What seems, therefore, to be established by these traditions, and such evidence as there is to support them, is that there were clearly two bodies of lawyers settled in the Temple one before the other "soon after" its grants to the Knights Hospitallers—the compounders under the Earl of Lancaster and the "professors" from Thavye's Inn. Now, if the latter became the sole possessors of the Temple, what, it naturally occurs to ask, became of the former? Were they turned out? That is contradicted by the assertion of the MS. that they "continued there ever since" (a).

It seems more reasonable to suppose, therefore, that while the "professors from Thavye's Inn" (if that were their place of origin) had a lease granted to them of the part unoccupied by the original settlers, at an annual rent (as Dugdale says) of ten pounds, the former obtained a confirmation of their grant from the Earl of Lancaster on the part of the new owners, on similar terms, and that thus the whole of the Temple, or such part of it as the men of law required, became finally divided between two sets of tenants settled side by side (b). This theory conflicts, indeed, not only with tradition, but with the inference to be drawn from the Inner Temple MS. that the two societies never claimed by several leases, but by one entire grant. But tradition, as will be shown later, is not on this point to be relied on, and the MS. gives no authority. We have not the original lease or leases or grant before us, and can, therefore, only judge of its nature by the probabilities of the case, and these are all

(a) That they were still there in 1329 there seems some evidence to show in the mandate of the King issued in that year to have the passage from the Temple kept open, that his "clerks, justices and others" might not be hindered on their way to Westminster by water, it being not unreasonable to suppose that some of these "clerks, justices and others" were Temple lawyers. See Rymer's Fœdera, vol. iv. p. 406.

(b) That the lease, if drawn before the year 1354, contained some reservations is evident, as in that year the Prior was responsible for the repair of the Temple Bridge, as appears by the King's writ being directed to him. (See Rymer's Fœdera, vol. v. p. 778.) The Prior and Brethren, too, retained control of the Church and its services down to the time of the Reformation. (See Inner Temple Records, vol. i. p. xliii.)

against the MS. It may be true that there were never two leases, but not so that there was only one grant, for, as Mr. Pitt-Lewis, in his reference to this, points out (a), there is evidence in the drafting of the Charter granted by James I. to the Inns to show that, if there was never but one lease, there were two separate parcels exacting two separate rents, each society paying for itself the sum of ten pounds per annum, not the joint sum of twenty. What was in James's Charter was, almost to a certainty, in the documents from which it was drawn, each of which was based upon a previous instrument back to the original conveyance.

Such inferences, therefore, as may be drawn from an examination of the grant of James I. (and it seems the only source from which inferences as to the lease may be drawn) are all against the original unity of the two societies; and so, it may be said, is the testimony of every authentic reference to the Temple as the abode of the lawyers as far back as authentic records go. "The first distinct reference to the two Inns," as the learned Editor of the Inner Temple Records truly remarks (b), "is to be found in the Paston Letters" (c), in a letter dated 1st November 1440, which brings us back to within a century of the supposed settlement under the Hospitallers; and if, as Mr. Inderwick goes on to say, there is no clear evidence of more than one society occupying the Temple during that antecedent period, neither, it should be said (and it seems more to the point to say), is there any inconsistent with that state of things. The truth is that there is no known reference to the Temple at all as the abode of lawyers earlier than that in the Paston Letters, except one—the passage quoted by Dugdale from the Prologue of Chaucer, as evidence (as he said) that the lawyers were there in Edward III.'s time (a); and, though attempts have been made to read into this passage the existence of only one Inn, the attempts, to say the least, have been unfortunate. The salient lines of the well-known and oft-quoted passage are these:—

“A Manciple there was of the Temple,
Of which all Catours might taken ensemple,
For to been wise in buying of Vitaile :

“Of masters had he mo than thrice ten,
That were of Law expert and curious,
Of which there was a dozen in that House
Worthy,” &c., &c.—

and the expressions relied on in support of what may be called the Unionist theory are those in italics. These, it is urged, imply the existence at the time of writing (probably 1387) of but one House. But, unfortunately for this contention, the most approved texts of Chaucer (b) read not “The Temple,” but “a Temple,” an expression defined by Mr. Skeat (the most accepted authority on such a matter) to mean here simply “an Inn of Court” (c), in which case no more need be said; but even if the text from which Dugdale quoted be the correct one, it is difficult to see that the poet, writing simply for the purposes of his story, in introducing the “Manciple of the Temple,” had anything more in his mind than an officer of one of the societies there, or, it may be, if Mr. Skeat's commentary is correct, elsewhere.

But, however this may be, and however inconclusive the foregoing anti-unionist reasoning may appear, the (a) Dugdale supposes the Canterbury Tales to have been written in Edward III.'s reign; they would appear, however, not to have been begun before 1387, the tenth year of Edward's successor.—Dict. Nat. Biog., s.v. Chaucer, p. 196.

legend which attaches to the original unity of the Inns and their subsequent division seems so improbable as to be incredible. That legend, as recorded by Dugdale (a), is that "notwithstanding the spoil of the Temple by the Rebels [by Wat Tyler and his followers in 1381] the students of the Law so increased there that at length they divided themselves into two bodies, the one commonly known by the Society of the Inner Temple and the other of the Middle Temple." Now, setting aside the fact of a rapid increase of the supposed united society after their "spoil by the rebels" as one we should hardly have looked for, the statement that the result of that increase was division is not a little remarkable. Surely the course which we should have expected the Society to pursue under such circumstances would not be to divide, but, with its increasing prosperity, to extend its borders, and, whilst remaining united, provide increased accommodation for its overflowing members. Separation under such circumstances seems unnatural and impolitic, and we can hardly conceive of its taking place, unless from dissension from within, and of that there is no hint, at least in Dugdale's account (b). Sir Henry Chauncy, indeed, mentions it as a "report," which he may have heard during his residence in the Middle Temple (where he was admitted 9th Feb. 1649-50), that there was a "great dissention and quarrel" between the two Inns "touching the Houses of York and Lancaster" (c); but, as the wars of the Roses did not begin till 1455, and we have evidence (d) that the division was in being at least fifteen years before that date, the "report" can have no foundation. The fact of its existence, however, proves the necessity in men's minds of some better reason being given for the division of the Inns than that assigned to it in Dugdale's tradition.

(a) Orig. Jurid. p. 145.

(b) Indeed any attempt at separation would almost to a certainty have been summarily suppressed. See the result of such an attempt in the Inner Temple Records, vol. i. p. 103.

But there is another difficulty attending this traditional division story which seems to discredit it. The two societies, until the acquisition of their respective freeholds under Charles II. (a), held their property by lease from the crown at a payment of ten pounds yearly from each society; and, as the crown lease was but a renewal of that from the Hospitallers, it may be assumed that under that body as their lessors the payments had been the same. But according to the Thavye's Inn tradition the Temple was leased to that body (the only society to occupy it) for one rent of ten pounds per annum (b). Now, if this were the case, whenever the division took place, one would have supposed that the apportionment of rent would have been halved, and that the share of each Inn would have been not ten pounds, but five. As it is, or was, each part, under the supposed division, paid separately as much as before they paid jointly—an arrangement very advantageous to the lessors, but eminently unlikely on the part of the lessees. But, if the difficulties attending this division theory are great, those surrounding the legend of the original identity of the two Inns, of which it is a corollary, are still more formidable. For, if this legend be true, one of the two Inns, as they at present exist, must necessarily be the stem and the other the offshoot of the original; and there is no claim that has been more strongly insisted on on both sides than that of the absolute equality of the two societies (c)—an equality which, though in theory admitted for the avoidance of contention, could not in the nature of things exist under such circumstances. The Inn, whichever it might be, with the better claim to antiquity would necessarily take precedence. As a matter of fact, each Inn, whilst theoretically disclaiming superiority, has made this claim in its turn, thus assuming a position at once illogical and contradictory. In his Introduction to the Inner Temple Records (a), the learned writer more than once speaks of the Inner Temple as the "old 'Inn' or 'House,'" whilst Master Worsley, an equally good authority, in his book on the Middle Temple, edited by Master Hopwood (b), as well as Sir Henry Chauncy in his Antiquities of Hertfordshire, make the same claim, and on what seem stronger grounds, for their own Inn (c). The alternative theory, advocated in these pages, of the original duality of the two societies, to whatsoever objections it may otherwise be open, has at least the merit of deciding these two conflicting claims in a manner compatible with the dignity of both claimants, and of vindicating the otherwise inconsistent claim to "equality."

It is not proposed here to go further into the details of this controversy respecting the relative antiquity of found that "there was no distinction in the matter of antiquity between the two houses, they both being derived from a common stock," but the decision was one framed with an obvious desire to satisfy both parties. See the Inner Temple Records, vol. ii. p. xxxii.

(a) vol. i. pp. xiii, xviii.

(b) p. 9.

(c) Master Worsley combats the Inner Temple claims to greater antiquity, seriatim; but, in support of the claim of the Middle Temple, lays most stress on the possession on the part of that Inn to this day of the arms or badge of the Templars, affirming that the society as a thing not to be doubted before the separation assumed that badge, therefore its retention after the separation "is a strong argument that they were the standing society," &c., and Sir Henry Chauncy taking a similar line speaks of the Middle Temple as retaining the hall of the old Society, as well as its arms, also the "north side of the church"—the place of honour—"to themselves, for their peculiar use" (Antiquities of Hertfordshire, vol. ii. p. 434). As a matter of fact, however, the Middle Temple did not assume the Agnus as a badge till about the year 1615, but their adoption of it then was probably only the outward expression of a traditional belief.

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.

the sister Inns. They will be found amply set forth in the sources above indicated, and in most books dealing with the Temple and its history. It is sufficient to say that both claims are based upon what are little better than pure speculations. All that is contended for here is the greater probability of what may be called the never-one theory—a theory which has not only the merit, as just noted, of reconciling difficulties, but of harmonising more fully than any other with the few facts left for our guidance. Accepting, therefore, the theory as established—pending the discovery of fresh facts of an absolutely decisive nature (a)—the History of the Middle Temple, though dating in its most authentic form, as has been said, from the commencement of its Registers in 1501, may be traced back to a Society existing before the occupation of the Temple, which, side by side, and simultaneously with the Society now known as the Inner Temple, took up its residence there, and became a co-tenant of its grounds and buildings (b). Whether they or the Inner Templars were the first to arrive it is not easy, or, perhaps, possible to decide; but as the latter claim to be the representatives of the former occupants of Thavye's Inn, the Middle Templars must be the successors of the Duke of Lancaster's tenants, and therefore the earlier in possession. But that is a matter which in no manner affects their perfect equality, for as lessees from the same date subsequently of the (a) Mr. Pitt-Lewis thinks this not impossible, and suggests even that the original grant of the Temple by the Knights Hospitallers, or its confirmation, may be yet existent amongst the stores at the Record Office. Should such a document ever turn up, all need for speculation will be avoided. Till some such find occurs, speculation will for a certainty go on (History of the Temple, pp. 58, 59).

(b) The structural arrangements of the Temple at the time of its vacation by the Knights Templars was such as to invite its occupation by two sets of tenants, inasmuch as it possessed two halls, one in the Inner and one in what was even then probably known as the Middle Court, with sets of chambers attached to each. (See Addison's Knights Templars, p. 354.)

ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY.

Hospitallers, on that body coming into possession, they stand absolutely on the same footing (a).

Assuming then, as we think we have made out a just claim to do, that the origin of the Middle Temple is that here indicated, its subsequent history may be very briefly summarised. Established as a separate and independent body on the commanding and convenient site of the New Temple, it doubtless, side by side with its sister Inn there, and with the two other Inns without, received and, as we should now term it, assisted in educating for the Bar, and for the judicial service of the country, such of the youth of England as aspired to such service; and, although it is impossible to give their names, except in a very few instances, it no doubt numbered among its ancient alumni its full share of those who distinguished themselves in earlier, as well as in later, times in that way (b). As to its internal organisation in the times before the Registers, except that it was based upon the model of the ecclesiastical schools, and generally of university and collegiate institutions, to which it with the other Inns succeeded, we have no direct means of judging. We may assume, however, that it was from the first very much what Fortescue described it in the latter part of (a) On this question as to the original homes of the two bodies then settling in the Temple, Mr. Pitt-Lewis has some interesting remarks. Admitting the probability of the Inner Templars hailing from Thavye's Inn, he would trace the other section to a former home in St. George's Inn, an ancient lodging of students within the city, described by Stowe (Bk. iii. cap. 12, p. 247. Ed. Strype) as once standing on a piece of ground near Seacole Lane, but in his time long ago decayed. Mr. Lewis bases its connection with the Middle Temple through New Inn, formerly "Our Lady's Inn," to which the St. Georgians (or those of them, it is presumed, who did not emigrate to the Temple) removed on the decay of their old house. Mr. Lewis points out in confirmation of this connection the use by the Middle Temple of the Cross of St. George in addition to the Agnus. The theory is plausible, and not improbable, but the question of the original duality of the Temple Societies in no way depends upon its establishment or the contrary. See History of the Temple, pp. 64-67.

the fifteenth century (apud 1470) (a), and essentially very much what it remained in the beginning of the next (anno 1501), the date of the first of the existing Registers.

That there are no similar records of an earlier date is a matter not only of regret but one of some mystery. It is hardly credible that none were kept; and even if, as is commonly reported, the records down to the date of Wat Tyler's Rebellion (1381) were destroyed by that lawyer-hating rebel and his followers, there remains a period of a hundred and twenty years still blank. It is possible, of course, that the books then kept may have been mislaid or destroyed, but it seems inconceivable that there were none. Indeed, a memorandum on the first page of the present Register precludes the idea (b). Their non-existence both in the case of the Inner as well as of the Middle Temple before about the same date seems to point to some disaster within the Temple, in the way of fire or otherwise, left unrecorded.

He describes the Inns of Court as not only law schools, but seminaries of polite learning frequented by the flower of English youth—a character they have more or less truly deserved ever since.

Thomas Jubbys is dispensed from all offices; also to be in commons and out of commons at his liking, for a fine of 3l. 6s. 8d.

Entylsam was chosen to the office of Butler, because Bukberd refused the office aforesaid. And it was resolved (consideratum) that Bukberd should forfeit to the Company 40s. Afterwards it was assessed at another Parliament at 20s.

At a Parliament holden 8 Feb., 18 Hen. VII.

Fetyplace is pardoned because he refused the office of Steward, for a fine of 40s. on account of illness, etc.

Chamberleyne, senior, was admitted as member to the Masters' commons, and is discharged from all his vacations for a fine of 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

Chamberleyne, junior, was admitted as member generally.

Lytton, of the Exchequer, was admitted as member, and is pardoned his vacations for half a pipe of good wine, etc.

At a Parliament holden 22 May, 18 Hen. VII.

Master Elyot was chosen Reader for the coming vacation, because he was chosen Serjeant-at-law.

And it is agreed at the present Parliament that Nicholas Hughson shall not henceforth be in commons except at his pleasure, for a fine of 20*s.* by pledge of William Mordaunt; which the same William afterwards, viz., 28th day of May, in the said year, paid into the hands of John Brooke, Treasurer, etc. Therefore as well the foresaid Nicholas as the foresaid William are quit and discharged thereof, etc.

Feldyng was admitted as member, generally.

Davers was admitted into the chamber of Lewis Pollard.

Gerlyngston is assigned to a chamber with Sperke in place of Master Catesby, etc.

Draper is assigned to a chamber with More de H.

Marke was dismissed from the company, and is pardoned all his arrears for a fine of 13*s.* 4*d.* as poverty, etc.

Thomas Emson was admitted as member, on condition that he keep all his vacations, except Christmas vacations, and that he keep other vacations instead of them immediately; and he is discharged from every office of the place for a fine of one pipe of wine; and he was admitted into the chamber of Master Elyot, with Master Catesby, etc.

And that the said Thomas Emson shall be allowed to reside in the inn (hospicio) or house called Le Newyn (New Inn), to live* and be a fellow commoner (commensalis) there, and continue until he considers himself capable and sound in knowledge from his study of the law of the land of England; and that he meanwhile shall not be bound by the constitutions, decrees, laws or rules of this house or inn, or obliged to

At a Parliament holden 3 July, 18 Hen. VII.

The same John Brooke, at the special request of the whole company of the Middle Temple, took upon himself again to be Treasurer for the year next following.

Auditors { Mordaunt.

Hyll was admitted as member, generally.

John Mordaunt, junior, was admitted as member; and the same John is pardoned keeping all his vacations, and occupying or exercising all and all manner offices in this house. And it is granted at the present Parliament that he shall not be compelled to keep any vacations, nor be chosen to occupy any office to be occupied within this house, nor be compelled to occupy any office; and likewise that he shall not be compelled to be in commons, unless at his liking. And all these things are granted and admitted for a fine of four marks, by the surety of William Mordaunt, etc.

Lychefeld was admitted as member, and entered as clerk, on condition that if he miss any reading vacation, that then he shall keep in its stead one Christmas vacation, etc.

Dynham was admitted as member, and entered as clerk, on condition that he shall not be charged with any office at the feast of Christmas then next following after his entry, etc.

Berton was admitted as member, and entered as clerk, on condition that he shall not be compelled to keep the next vacation immediately after his entry into commons; and [if] he miss any vacation at the feast of Christmas, that then he shall keep another vacation of the same feast in its stead immediately and next following.

Afterwards, that is, on the 9th day of November in the 19th year of the reign of King Henry VII., the foresaid William Mordaunt, the surety for the said John Mordaunt, paid for the fine of the same John, the foresaid four marks into the hands of the foresaid John Broke, Treasurer, etc.

Therefore, let as well the same John Mordaunt, as the foresaid William Mordaunt, be quit and discharged thereof, etc.

John Sedley was admitted as member, and discharged and exonerated from all his vacations, and from all offices of the place whatever; and to be in commons and out of commons at his liking. And he was admitted in "Le Maunse" into the chamber late John Smyth's, for a fine of 33s. 4d., which he paid to John Brooke, then Treasurer, on the last day of November, in the 19th year of King Henry VII.

At a Parliament holden 2 Nov., 19 Hen. VII.

Palmys, senior, was chosen for Reader, in the following Lent.

More was chosen to the office of Steward for the feast of Christmas then next following.

Stucley was chosen for Marshal for the foresaid feast; and if he refuse, then Heyron; and if Heyron refuse, then Paston. And afterwards Paston took upon himself the foresaid office.

Hasylwode, junior, was chosen to the office of Butler.

Hall was chosen to the office of Constable of the Tower.

Hasy, Feldyng and Apprise were chosen to the office of Masters of the Revels.

Etton was admitted as member, and entered as clerk, on condition that if he miss the next Christmas feast, then he shall keep another feast in its stead immediately.

At a Parliament holden 9 Nov., 19 Hen. VII.

For Serjeants-at-law, viz., for Elyot and Pollard. And then it was given to be understood by the Company that Palmys, junior, was to be Serjeant, by virtue of a certain warrant of our lord the King directed to the Bishop of London, then Keeper of the Great Seal of our said lord the King. And afterwards officers were chosen for the feast of the said Serjeant, viz., "marschalles, surveyers, suers, conveyers, and controllers," each one according to his rank, etc.

Memorandum: That the foresaid Serjeants were not at the aforesaid Parliament, but it was considered by the Company that they should have among them as reward 20 marks, as was customary,* etc.

The feast for the Serjeants-at-law was held at Lambeth, in the hostel of the Archbishop of Canterbury, on Monday next before the feast of St. Martin the Bishop, in the winter, in the 19th year of the reign of King Henry VII.

And before the foresaid feast, viz., on Friday, about the third hour after nones, there assembled in the Hall, round "le Cubbord," all the members in town, as well those who were in commons, as others who are not bound to be in commons by reason of their wives being in town, or by reason of special pardons by fine. And then four of those "aunciens" were sent to the chambers of those who were ordained to be Serjeants-at-law, to bring them up to "le Cuppeborde," where Westby, Second Baron of the Exchequer, and Bollyng, Third Baron of the Exchequer, stood with Master Empson. Also many of the seniors and almost all the members were present. And the said Wesby, giving to those who were chosen to be Serjeants praise for their good behaviour and good conduct, which were the cause of their election, desired† them to have the Fellowship in their favour, etc., with other discourse fitting for the subject. And then the Treasurer delivered to them 20 marks in gold and silver, enclosed in a new glove, on receiving which they thanked the Fellowship not only for the money, but for other benefits, as learning in law and binding‡ them to study by the good rules ordained by the Company, which restrained them in youth from their dislike to study, etc. And then they drank all together, and went with them, conveying them by "la barge," as far as the hostel at Lambeth. And there they left them, etc.

Also, on the morrow, viz., Saturday, divers, that is almost all the members of the four Inns, at the desire of the said Serjeants. viz., each one desired those of his own Fellowship to dine with him, and they did so, etc.

Also, on Sunday, all the justices were before ten o'clock in the chapel of the hostel at Lambeth aforesaid, and the new Serjeants, bending their knee before them, made declarations on the first writs delivered to them by Mordaunt and Muscott, prothonotaries of the court. These narrations being finished, the Chief Justice of the King's Bench praised them for the declarations which they had made, and showed to them more good examples of their predecessors, and then placed "lez Coyfes" on their heads, and tied them under their chins, and clothed them one by one with hoods of scarlet ([provided] by the same Serjeants at their own costs), placing the same hoods on their shoulders like doctors; and so they were created Serjeants-at-law in the presence of the public before the whole Inn,* the folk standing round. And then all the justices entered the Hall, with the said Serjeants following them, and the justices sat in the Hall at the high table, and other great folk with them, and the Serjeants sat in the lower part of the Hall, in the south end of the same Hall.

Also, on Monday, the said Serjeants came to Westminster Hall, and before them all men of their livery and well ranked; but next before them a Serjeant-at-Arms with a great "mase," and the Warden of the Flete with his staff. And all the new Serjeants-at-law stood in the south part of the Hall, opposite the Court of Common Bench, and always the eldest of them, by his admission, from which he was chosen Serjeant, on the higher side. And then two of the old Serjeants went from the bar of the Court up to the new Serjeants, and took the senior between them, and led him to the bar, before the Chancellor of England, the Treasurer of England, with all the other justices then present there. And he made his declaration, and one of the old Serjeants made a defence, and the prothonotary read the writ. And so they did with each, etc.

And afterwards they went to their Inn, and on the same day, the King, with his whole household, breakfasted with them.

Memorandum: That for those three days no order was made for the Company in the four Inns of Court nor in the Inns of Chancery, because all breakfasted with the foresaid Serjeants, and very many others to the number of 1,000.

At a Parliament holden 12 Feb., 19 Hen. VII.

It was considered by the Company that More, Steward for the feast of Christmas last past, should be allowed by the Treasurer for the apparel for the same feast, 34s. 4d.

At a Parliament holden 23 Nov., 15 Hen. VIII.

At this Parliament it was considered by the whole Fellowship, that none of the Company should be compelled to keep next Christmas vacation except at his will and pleasure.

But if any one keeps the vacation and is present in commons, that then it shall be allowed to him for a vacation, etc.

And further it was ordained that if there be twelve persons in the Fellowship at Christmas time, that these twelve can keep commons, etc. And if there are less, no commons shall be kept within the Inn, until more come.

And further it was ordained that all officers chosen in the last Parliament for Christmas time, shall be discharged thereof for this Christmas time, for divers causes moving the Fellowship, etc.

Nevertheless it was ordained that the Treasurer should agree with the Harper* for his wages at Christmas time, so that he shall attend the better in future, etc. 20s. Paid.

And it was ordained that if commons be kept by any of the Fellowship at Christmas time, for three weeks, then shall only be allowed for them out of the Treasury of the House for those three weeks, as much as was allowed to the Steward for Apparels in last year, by Master Marvyn, senior, by Master Englefeld, or Master Hardyng, viz., 37s.

37s., paid by R. L., Treasurer.

At a Parliament of the Middle Temple holden on Thursday next after the Feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary (4 Feb.), 15 Hen. VIII.

At this Parliament Masters Knyghtley and Montague, who will read in Autumn vacation, were chosen Assistants to Master Vowell, Reader in time of Lent next coming, etc.

And Master Knyghtley is discharged of any assistance for the first reading.

And Master Montague was chosen for Reader in Autumn time next. Yet he is not named Reader until next term according to the form of the statute.

And because the same Montague was chosen Steward at Christmas time last, and did not exercise the office, as appears in the preceding Parliament, nor bore any charges therefor, therefore it is agreed that he shall pay to the Fellowship, 5 marks.

(In the margin.) 5 marks to me, Richard Lyster, Treasurer.

John Colbeck admitted to the Clerks' commons, and is discharged the offices of Butler and Constable of the Marshal, at the instance of Master Luke.

Feldyng is pardoned pensions in arrear, up to the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Mary last, for divers considerations moving the Fellowship, and he shall pay 10s.

(In the margin.) 10s. paid to me. R. L.

Arthur Rysse was admitted as member, generally, by Master Jenour, etc.

Master Francis Denham, junior, was admitted, etc.

William Wyat was admitted as member, and is pardoned all offices and vacations, and gives for a fine 20s. Paid to me. Richard Lyster.

At a Parliament holden 3 May, 16 Hen. VIII.

Master Montague was chosen Reader for the time of Autumn next coming, and will be now named Reader, by ordinance, etc.

Master Vowell was chosen Assistant to the Reader in next vacation.

Edward Saunders was admitted generally as member, by, etc.

At a Parliament holden on Thursday after the Feast of St. Thomas the Martyr (7 July), 16 Hen. VIII.

Master Husey and Master Fitz James are appointed Auditors, to audit the account of Richard Lyster, Treasurer.

Richard Lyster, Solicitor of our lord the King, at the special instance and request of the whole Fellowship, took upon himself to exercise the office of Treasurer, for one year next ensuing. And thus he was re-elected to the said office.

Master Whorwode was chosen by the Fellowship at the instance of the Treasurer, to collect and levy debts in place of the Treasurer, as an assistance to the Treasurer for the time being.

It is granted by the Fellowship that if Coly goes beyond the sea in the next vacation, he shall not lose or forfeit anything therefor, if he keep the vacation next ensuing.

John Sent Poill was admitted generally to the Clerks' commons, except that he shall keep one vacation for another, whenever, etc. And he was admitted with the Treasurer's assent into the new chamber on high, viz., into the highest west chamber of the chambers newly built, with Master Geoffrey Poole. And at the same Parliament William Thorpe was admitted into the said chamber as expectant, etc., by the Fellowship and Treasurer aforesaid, etc.

At a Parliament holden on Thursday after the Feast of All Saints (3 Nov.), 16 Hen. VIII.

Reader.—Master Saunders was chosen Reader for Lent vacation next coming, for his first reading, by assent of Master Husey, to whose turn the reading had then come for his second reading, and this [was done] divers considerations moving the Fellowship. And because he is discharged the office of Steward at next Christmas time, it was resolved that he shall pay to the Fellowship, in the name of a fine, 10 marks, whereof he is pardoned by special favour, 33s. 4d. And the remainder is to be paid to the Steward before next Christmas, viz., 100s.

Steward.—Master Pateshale was chosen to the office of Steward at next Christmas time, and in his default Masters Fitz Hughe and Warner in order.

Marshal.—Masters Carant, Russell, Bulkeley, senior, Ludlowe, Barnewell and Conyngesbye were chosen to the office of Marshal, in order.

Butler.—Masters Sudeley, junior, Owen, Higham, and Danyll, junior, were chosen in order to the office of Butler.

And afterwards Sudeley is pardoned the office of Butler, because he promised henceforth to make up the account* of each Treasurer, yearly, etc.

Master of the Revels.—Masters Asplond, Calley, Castell, junior, and Puttenham, Lyte, Dygbye, junior, and Blake, three of them were chosen to the office of Masters of the Revels, and that they should be so, in order.

Master Constable of the Tower.—Chybnall, Marschall, Felgate, and Cokesey were chosen to the office of Constable of the Tower, in order.

The Marshal's Constable.—Masters Thorell, Cave, Sydenam, and Reade were chosen to the office of Marshal, in order.

Fine, two "hoggeshedes" of wine, or 4*l.*—Nicholas Wadham, knight, and Christopher Sydnam were chosen members; and are pardoned all offices and vacations; and each of them shall pay one "hoggeshede" of wine or 40s. as a fine, at the instance of Mr. Paulett.

Fine, 20s.—William Couper was admitted as member, and is pardoned all offices and vacations, and pays as fine, 20s.

At a Parliament holden on Friday, the Morrow of the Purification of the Blessed Mary (3 Feb.), 16 Hen. VIII.

At this Parliament, Masters Mervyn and Fitzhughe were chosen Assistants to Master Saunders, Reader, for the time of Lent next. And in default of Fitzhughe, Master Warner was chosen Assistant.

And Master Fitzhughe was named to be Reader; and if he refuse, then Master Warner was named Reader for next Autumn time. And as to the exercise of the office of Steward at last Christmas time, by them, the fine therefor is respited because the Fellowship wished to be advised thereon, etc.

Also, it was ordained that the Steward of the Inn shall collect rolls.

At the Parliament on 25 Nov., 27 Eliz., playing at dice or cards, outcries in the night, breaking open chambers, as by the lord of Candlemas night, were forbidden; and on Candlemas night 32 Eliz. divers gentlemen set up a Lord of Misrule and were punished therefor; and the Masters of the Bench caused notice of the said ordinance and a general admonition to be given in the midst of supper on Candlemas day last. In spite of all this, Messrs. Lower, Fletwood, Martyn, Ameridyth, Thornhill, Swetenam, Davys, and Jacob, with others not yet known, broke the ordinance by making outcries, forcibly breaking open chambers in the night and levying money as the Lord of Misrule's rent, and contemptuously refused to declare the names of the others; and Mr. Lower abused Mr. Johnson, a Master of the Bench. It is therefore ordered that Mr. Lower shall be expelled and the others pay a fine of 20*l.* before the end of this term, and be out of commons though paying for them till the fine is paid. If they fail to pay before the end of this term, they shall be expelled. When those not known are discovered, they shall be out of commons, but pay for them until they have paid the fine assessed by the Masters of the Bench. Any one in future breaking this ordinance shall ipso facto be expelled. English.

The Utter Barristers called by Mr. Williams, Serjeant elect, and by Mr. Cavell in their readings, are confirmed. English.

Orders sent to the Inns of Court and Chancery by the Judges in Hilary Term, 36 Eliz., by them thought meet to be observed, but referred to every House of Court to consider, and the Benchers to answer.

1. That none be called to the Bar but those of convenient continuance who have used the exercises of the House, as in arguing of cases, "putting at boltes," and keeping the moots and exercises three years at least.

2. That not above three or four be called to the Bar at any reading, and those to be called by the Reader, where in times past it has been so used, of such as he will stand to answer for; but those names only are to stand who shall be allowed by the Bench at the first Parliament the next term after the call, or otherwise by the Grand Council where it hath been so used. The names of those called are to be delivered by the Reader or Treasurer the said next term to the ancientest Justice of the House. If there be none such, then to the Chief Justice.

3. That none be admitted to read but those who are esteemed for their learning and credit, fit to serve in the common weal, and who have attended the reading in the exercises there two years before their call to that place; unless it is thought otherwise convenient for some reasonable cause of let to be signified to the ancientest Justices of that House, or if none such be, then to the Chief Justice.

4. That no single Reader be admitted to read in Lent, but that the same reading be always supplied by a double Reader as heretofore has been accustomed, unless upon some special occasion to be allowed by the Justices of the House, or by the Chief Justices and Chief Baron, or two of them.

5. That before any be called to read, a note of the names of three or four next in turn to read be delivered to the Justices of the House, or to the Chief Justices and Chief Baron.

6. That the readings be held out the whole three weeks as in ancient time, and the former good orders for diet and guests to be admitted in readings be observed.

7. That none be called to the Bar by any letters, corruption, or reward, on pain of expulsion of the Reader who calleth, and of the person called.

8. That the Readers be always moved to make their case short, not containing above two or three points at the most, and those as much upon the Statute read on as may be.

9. That in the moots, both in the Houses of Court and Chancery, the pleadings be rehearsed and used as in former times, and thereupon to go to the case, but not without the pleadings drawn, pleaded, and recited. That no case in any Inn of Chancery contain above three points or questions at most, and that the cases be short. English.

The Answer of the Benchers of the Middle Temple to the Orders delivered by the Judges in Hilary Term, 36 Eliz.

1. This article is the ancient and still continued order and use of the House, saving that the time was not limited to three years, and that sometimes men of good discretion, being of ability in living, by office or otherwise, and of long continuance in the House, and such as were not like to use the Bars in the Courts at Westminster, have been admitted into the Society of Utter Barristers.

2. Of ancient time the Utter Barristers were only called by the Reader, and seldom above four at one time. But by an Act of their Parliament, 7 Eliz., it was ordained that no Reader should call any Utter Barrister, unless it were first assented to in Parliament and appointed how many he should call. Since then, by the orders established by the Queen's command, with the advice of the Privy Council and Justices, 16 Eliz., and renewed 26 Eliz., none is to be called to the Utter Bar but by the ordinary council of the House in term time. Afterwards, 31 Eliz., it was ordained by Parliament of this House that a double Reader should call four only and a single Reader two, of such good students as they thought meet, whom the Bench might disallow. The Bench also had liberty to call such good students as were not called in due time by the Readers and yet deserved the preferment of the Utter Bar.

3. That by the ancient orders still continued, four of the ancient Utter Barristers are bound to keep four vacations and to stand at the Cupboard four readings next before their turn to read, and there to argue the Reader's cases and keep moots and cases of the House; out of which four the Benchers at their Parliament choose the most sufficient man for learning, discretion, ability, and other gifts to be the next Summer Reader.

4. The ancient order has always been to supply the reading in Lent by double Readers, which order is still continued, unless there happened to be just occasion to supply the vacation with a single Reader.

5. They have never used any such order, and think that they in their Parliament in conference together, of their knowledges touching any Reader to be called, may best discern touching his exercise, touching his knowledge, gifts of utterance, discretion and ability to maintain his countenance, considering they have lived many years before with him.

6. The sixth agrees with their ancient orders, and is now very necessary to be thoroughly renewed and duly observed.

7. By their Parliament, 22 Eliz., it is ordered that none sue by letters or otherwise directly or indirectly to be preferred to the Bar, on pain of disgrace by rejecting him.

8. This was the ancient order, and they intend to renew it by authority of their Parliament.

9. It is the ancient order of the House, and they continue it, and will see it renewed in their Inn of Chancery.

The Benchers will willingly endeavour to cause these orders to be observed for their time, and have established them at their present Parliament. English.

Divers Utter Barristers, being vacationers, have lately absented themselves and not been in commons in reading times, so that the moot-men of this House in the Inns of Chancery have many times failed by reason of the small appearance of Utter Barristers; and also the young gentlemen vacationers have for the most part not been in commons in Christmas, Lent, and Summer vacations, so that the charges have been greater to those in commons; it is therefore ordered that henceforth every Utter Barrister who has not served all his vacations, shall be in commons five weeks every Lent and four weeks every Summer till he has served six vacations after being called to the Bar, the vacation beginning the first day of every reading, on pain of a fine of 20s. Young gentlemen who are generally admitted, and who do not duly attend and be in commons for six vacations after their admittance, viz. three weeks at Christmas, five weeks in Lent, and four weeks in Summer vacations, shall pay 20s. the next term after every vacation or reading. Utter Barristers and Inner Barristers who have been out of commons and forfeited their vacations, shall pay the money due by them, and the refusers fined and punished as shall seem convenient to the Masters of the Bench. English.

The following vacationers are fined 20s. each for absence at Christmas, 1595:—Messrs. R. Bellingham, Barnefeild, Bourk, W. Brodnax, Borlas, Cumpton, Coxwell, Clifford, J. Culpeper, jun., T. 9 Feb., 1597. While the Masters of the Bench and other fellows were quietly dining publicly in the Hall, John Davyes, one of the Masters of the Bar, in cap and gown, and girt with a dagger, his servant and another with him being armed with swords, came into the Hall. The servant and the other person stayed at the bottom of the Hall, while he walked up to the fireplace and then to the lower part of the second table for Masters of the Bar, where Richard Martyn was quietly dining. Taking from under his gown a stick, which is commonly called "a Bastianado," he struck Martyn on the head with it till it broke, and then running to the bottom of the Hall he took his servant's sword out of his hand, shook it over his own head (super caput suum proprium quatiebat), and ran down to the water steps and jumped into a boat. He is expelled, never to return.
